Well, you know how it is; everybody wants their pound of flesh before they agree to anything, regardless of how valid the project is.....

I would sure think that removal of the tanks would be self-mitigating

Talked to the guardian's boss, who said Global Diving and Salvage has submitted permit applications to the DNR for tank removal; permitting process can take up to 90 days, according to the guardian, and DNR is not the only agency that must approve.

I just spoke to the guardian, who says they are working on a contract to remove them, but she has to ask someone else about the time frame, and that person is (b) (6). She will call me back when she knows something.

DNR? Good to know. Do you have a contact person / project officer?

Those are the Sesko submarine-stuck-on-the-bottom-lifters. I'm sure that's not what they're called, but Bill was trying to invent something to raise sunken subs. DNR is supposed to remove them soon. They have nothing in them except for air.

Janet, this topic came up at Greg's neighborhood meeting with the College. Do we know who owns these tanks? Does the City have any jurisdiction regarding code compliance? Folks were wondering what possible hook we might have to get these tanks out of there. Thanks chal
